ABSTRACT

When the women and children were abducted they had a sense of losing themselves among many new faces, this made an efficient change in how they started to view the world, the lack of empathy and empathies caused multiple severe traumas to everyone around them. No one had the heart to wonder what was lost and what is being taken away, once the found out how families were taken into consideration of slavery and not humanity. The Aboriginal lives mostly revolves around preserving their own culture and language, when the European Influence started to roar high, the perseverance of the language started to change. Every time the colonisation starts in the low bed, the people who wanted to raise above started falling apart due to the lack of communication skills. People who were communicating in the non-verbal were seen as low and cheap as the communication developed all around the World, Australia being the land of bush and sea, the people did not see deep into the language issue, since there was no huge requirement to use a specific skill or language to understand what is happening all around them. The invasion was different for them, apart from it they realised how the Europeans and the Westerner's had a distinct way of speaking and changing the verbal ways accordingly, this made them to feel like they were no fit for the mingling of the new people. The natives always wanted to preserve and observe the nature in order to understand the connection between nature and community, the respect they had for nature and the trust they presented was also seen in this way of lifestyle and communication. The gestures these natives used are majorly not considered rude for them, but the outsiders saw this behaviour as rude and life threatening, the hand gestures were scary enough to make a grown man cry, but in reality they were doing their day to day communication without any intruders judging their ideas, the morally questioned people were not fit for answering the Natives hence they tied to establish the language which everyone can understand but under different dialects. The change of wanting to feel home and being in a sense of belonging was lacking in many more places, new land which they cant even claim as their own gave them issues, the language and feeling of being lost has destroyed each and everyone.

1. INTRODUCTION

When the Europeans set foot, they knew they were about to bring down the entire population down and spread their way of living as a result of domination, the male community set to be toxic and also the women themselves supported this, inspite of killing more and more natives they also took their language and made it impossible to learn for their future generations, around the globe the European civilisation wanted to thrive and made sure they thrived and yet they are thriving after all the oppression they caused. The troubled culture and the people had no sympathy towards destroying of native languages, the preserving on languages was considered as the greatest downfall as English would not rise, hence the Britishers had no other way other than running away with priced possessions, the amount of languages they have destroyed so far just to spread their influence and made the natives feel inferior in majority of the cases they moved the slang and its variants into trash. When British had been in any land for longer than an year they all force the children to learn English, the westernised way of living was not suitable for the altering climate and living condition that was present there. No amount of wars and protest was enough, possible cases many natives died. The obscure state left the country as soon as possible, the British entirely took over the government and everything under their control ever since, they also wanted their language to be universal. Till date English is being used as world wide to understand irrespective of thousands of languages are struggling to thrive yet their language shines through everything.

2. FINDING THE LOST FAMILIES

Every place they travelled they left a benchmark, their dominance and geo political balance helped them throughout to spread and make it an universal language. All the third world countries till date use English for communicating over their regional language, even in some places the rural parts take over learning lessons to gain the knowledge of English over their own. The Colonial mindset has not changed in many parts of the society. People get joked out for not knowing the language. The Raise of British Empire was solely the reason for decline of all the other nations and empires. Their relationship with East India Company and building of huge metal factories with the help of slaves. Many English businessmen who stepped into the Native American land stole the children and converted them into Christians, including they changed the names of everyone, changing their ancestral names into generic christian names, changing their identity and looks. Many children at a very young age has had their hair cut and facial features to make them look more English, just for the “Namesake” many people have lost their lives. The pride and prestige that comes along with the people and conversation of religion has many forms in the land against the tribe. The Australian highlands and bushlands were surrounded by “Eden’s Garden”, this specially takes over the part of invasion terrible and difficult for the invaders. The birth of Jesus was taken as an incredible finding by Australians, naming an entire land after Eden identifies as “a land with no use”. The responsible part of protecting the dry land started with the salty sea air and bushes that bore no vegetation. When does one identify the soil and invade the land for wealth? The Australian culture differed a lot from North to South but the policy that was followed through the cultures were same, identifying the native tribes and their habits formed so many cultures, to begin with the Torres Strait island let alone had the most bushy geographical surroundings. This made the invaders to find the way hard back to enter in. In the year 1879, in search of dry lands for the “American Prisoners” the British set out for the journey. Forwarding with finding a small island surrounded by thick bush filled with venomous creatures and land sucking dry roots of the plant. Over 50,000 years ago the aboriginal history plays and takes into count the people of now East Asia. The marginalised community never got any shed of light until, David Unaipon mentioned, Totemism is one of the most ancient customs instituted by the Primitive Man (NL, 01)

Later on the British era established more critical conditions to their colony by burning the souls of independent children alone in this case, the punishments had to be severe in order to maintain law and order in a sane position, the effect of all the native habits started to wipe out, they also wanted the jails to be built by them for keeping the survivors who travelled along with them in the ship. The native idea of transforming lives and surviving was based on a large part of group where they depend on each other. The survival instincts always were to be protective of each other, since they lived in a place filled with the most poisonous creatures, the Eden Garden name was a puzzle fit.

Exaggeration about the representation of life was lacking with the Captain who first found the land had little to no understanding about the existence of other cultures, the idea of coloured people was new to them, We found the natives tolerably numerous as we advanced up the river said Watkin Tench, 1788. The Australian land which was the biggest island was considered to be the Land owned by 400 nations, Captain Cook’s, (TN, 34)

The more Captain Cook explains about the people he saw, till up the North of Australia, the fresh water rivers was flowing up until the end of the world, the accordance of native Australians believed that the land has existed ever since the sun rise has seen the world. The species that were found in the location are older than what the humans have seen. They had no idea of work since they met each other’s need in sincere ways. The colonists were surprised to see civilisation that was not laid by them, the harmonious life created without a drop of white present anywhere. The shock embodied throughout the highlands.

The colonisation is a benchmark for places that has seen better thing, the British always had the superiority complex of them making lives easier by giving people the conversion method, natives believed in the concept of worshipping the nature and well created arty-crafts. The sudden change of colonisation, altered how the people used to think based on differences present in each other. The changes happened in all the 400 places gave a right of abolishing everything they have ever owned.

The main mode of language spread when the ships set on the sail on the seas and stared down into the souls of the natives and captured their innocence in exchange for their whole life, throwing on everything that they had in their own hands, from food to hunting weapons was hand made by the crowd, but they never was able to get hold and withstand the power of machinery so they naturally had to give up on themselves. The single proto-language held more values more power than any world wide known language.

3. CONCLUSION

Single handedly British spread the language without anyone's help, all they required was to check how the government of one particular country or state, when the language started to develop the lifestyle also changed, the living conditions and standards improved in most cases and people fell for the trap and gave up on their religion and systematic living of lifestyle in a different culture. One can always look out like a vulture when people around them take turns and keep hitting different bench marks on their version of success, the natives and aboriginals never expected the British and the Westerners to succeed in their ways. The careless and ignorance played a major part in their lives by ruining the foundation they built all along.

Their scriptures were torn and threw into thin air. The more families required apologies from the nation they were ignored and the ego maintained high pressure. When the communities can go forward in life, the need well healed mental health. Regarding the life offered and given to the people by the government gave questionable choices for those who were in need. The conclusion also calls for several set of people who deserved apology from the British crown, when no one truly got what they were striving for, authors including Sally Morgan never understood why they had to hold their horses high.
